

Palindrome

Andries J. Greyling

Dedication

For the four men who never sat in the room — and for the film it has not yet become.

And for Jerome Bixby, who proved that one room, four chairs, and a single impossible thing said quietly is all the spectacle a story ever needs.

A Note to the Reader

This story was written backwards.

It began as a film — four actors, one room, an idea I could not shake: a dying man who claims to have lived his life many times, told to the only people who could have stopped him, with no effects, no leaving the room, nothing on the screen but faces and a thing said quietly. The kind of film that was once made without apology and is hardly made any more. So before I wrote a single line of screenplay, I wrote the book — because the book is where you find out whether the idea can actually hold a person's weight for an hour, or only looks as though it can.

The lineage is honest and I'll name it. The engine here is the one Jerome Bixby built in The Man from Earth — a premise interrogated by people who have something to lose by believing it — and the discipline I set myself is his: every proof must have a door. There is nothing in these pages you cannot explain away if you want to. That is not a weakness in the story; it is the story. The man who can no longer tell the true thing from the frightened thing is not a device. He is most of us, on the nights we are honest.

A palindrome reads the same forward and backward. I leave it to you to decide which way this one runs — and, if you are very honest, whether you would rather know.

— the author

One

The first thing Solomon Voss noticed, because noticing was the last profession he had left, was that August had set out four chairs.

Not three and the bed. Four chairs, drawn into a loose arc around the cold hearth, and the bed pushed back against the window as if August intended to leave it behind. A dying man arranges very little in the last weeks; the body becomes a country he is being deported from, and most men spend their final arrangements on the management of pain. August had spent his on furniture. He had moved chairs.

“You set these out yourself,” Voss said.

“I had Earl do the lifting.” August was in the chair nearest the window, a blanket over his knees in the particular way of a man who is cold in a warm room. “But I told him where. Sit, Sol. You’ll want to be sitting.”

Forty years of practice had taught Voss that you’ll want to be sitting was a sentence with a shape, and the shape was a confession. He had heard it from men who had killed their wives and from men who had simply, finally, decided to say a true thing out loud after a lifetime of not. He sat, and he arranged his own face into the thing he had worn into ten thousand rooms, the open, unhurried, faintly bored attention that gave a frightened person nothing to push against, and he prepared, with a small private grief, to be kind to a dying friend who had begun, at the end, to come apart.

Because that was the diagnosis he had brought with him in the car. He had let himself form it on the drive up, which was poor discipline, and he knew it was poor discipline, and he had done it anyway, because August had asked for him by his profession and not by his friendship. Bring the doctor, the message had said. Not the man. The doctor. You did not summon a clinical psychologist to a deathbed to reminisce. You summoned him to be a witness to your mind, and a man only wanted a witness to his mind when he had begun to doubt it.

Morphine did this. The dying brain, starved and flooded by turns, built cathedrals. Voss had sat with a hundred of them and he had learned never to argue with the architecture — you did not tell a man his visions were chemistry, you let him have the cathedral and you held his hand inside it. He had come to hold August's hand inside whatever August had built. That was all. He had not expected the chairs to bother him, and they bothered him.

Earl came in from the kitchen with a glass of water he set at August's elbow without being asked, and took the chair to August's left, and said nothing, which was Earl. Voss had known Earl Cade for thirty years and could have totalled his recorded speech across that time at perhaps a long afternoon. Earl had a face like a closed door in a wall you hadn't known was there. He sat now with his forearms on his knees and his hands loose between them, and he looked at the cold hearth as if there were a fire in it, and he waited.

And then the fourth chair, and the reason Voss's stomach had been wrong since he walked in, because he had counted the chairs and counted the men and the arithmetic had left one chair over until the door opened and Danny came through it.

Danny Reiss, who was not supposed to be the kind of man you noticed, and whom Voss had never been able to stop noticing — the way you can't stop noticing the one warm thing in a cold room. He had a bag of something from the pharmacy and the slightly hunted look of a person who has been sent on an errand to get him out of a house, and he stopped just inside the door when he saw the arc of chairs, and the fourth one empty and angled toward August, and he understood, the way Voss had understood, that this was not a vigil. It was a hearing.

"You're all here," August said, and there was in his voice neither triumph nor fear, only a kind of enormous tiredness finally being allowed to set something down. "Good. Sit, Danny. The chair's for you."

Danny sat. He held the pharmacy bag in his lap with both hands like a man in a waiting room.

For a moment no one said anything, and the house made the small sounds a house makes around four silent men — the tick of the cooling kettle, a branch against the gutter, the particular hush of a high room at the end of a winter afternoon when the light has gone flat and grey and final. Voss watched August breathe. The breathing was bad. There was a wet edge to it, a thing at the bottom of each inhalation that Voss did not need to be a different kind of doctor to read. Weeks. Perhaps not weeks.

“I’m going to tell you something,” August said, “and I’m going to ask you not to speak until I’m done. Not because I’m afraid of what you’ll say. Because if you start trying to fix it too early, you’ll fix the wrong thing, and we don’t have the time for the wrong thing.” He looked at each of them in turn, unhurried, and his eye when it reached Voss held a small dry warmth that was entirely sane, and that was the part Voss would think about later, in the car, in the months after — that there had been nothing in August’s eye that a clinician could circle on a page. “Sol. Especially you. You came here to listen to a dying man lose his mind. I’m asking you to do something harder. I’m asking you to listen to him keep it.”

Voss inclined his head a fraction, which was the gesture he used for I am listening and I am conceding nothing, and which August, who had known him a long time, clearly read exactly, because the corner of his mouth moved.

“All right,” August said. He folded his hands on the blanket. He looked, for a moment, at the cold hearth, the way Earl was looking at it, as if the two of them could see the same fire. And then he said it, flatly, the way a man reads a verdict that has already been handed down, in the voice of someone reporting a fact about the weather in a country none of them had been to:

“I have lived this life before. This exact life — this body, this town, the three of you. I have lived it, start to finish, and died at the end of it, and woken again at the beginning, as a child, in my own bed, with everything I am keeping in my head. And I have done it again. And again.” He drew one of the wet, effortful breaths. “This is the eleventh time. Ten times before this one I have sat where I’m sitting and died in that bed by the window. I know how this room smells in the last week. I have smelled it ten times.”

The kettle ticked. Outside, the branch moved against the gutter.

“And this time,” August said, “for the first time in eleven lives, I changed one thing. A small thing. The smallest thing I have ever been brave enough to change.” His gaze went, gently, to the man holding the pharmacy bag in both hands. “And because I changed it, one of you is sitting in this room who, by every other turn of this life, by all ten times before, has been dead for thirty years.”

He did not look away from Danny. He let it sit there, kind and terrible, in the grey final light.

“I needed to tell you while I still could,” August said, “because I think there’s a price for what I did. And I don’t know which of you is going to be asked to pay it.”

Voss became aware that he had not, for some seconds, taken a breath of his own. He took one now, quietly, the way you take a pulse without letting the patient feel you do it, and he reached — out of forty years of reflex, the way a man reaches for the rail on a stair he has stopped trusting — for the name of the thing that was happening in this room.

He had a hundred of them. Confabulation. Terminal lucidity inverted into grandiosity. A narrative constructed by a frightened mind to make an unbearable, meaningless death into a story with a shape and a purpose and a debt — I am not dying at random; I am completing a circle. It was, clinically, almost beautiful. He could have written the case up. He had the name in his hand, the way you have a coin in your hand, smooth and known and the right weight.

And then August turned from Danny and looked at him, only at him, and said, in the same flat patient voice:

“Sol. Before you settle on the word you just reached for — and I know which word it is, I’ve watched you reach for it ten times — ask me one thing. Ask me something only you would know. Something you have never told me. Never told anyone.” The dry warmth again, awful now. “Then pick your word.”

And Solomon Voss, who had come up the hill in the flat grey afternoon to hold a dying friend’s hand inside a cathedral built of morphine and fear, sat in the fourth chair's arc with the coin of the right diagnosis going slowly cold in his palm, and tried to think of a question that August Renner could not possibly answer.

Two

There is a thing Voss did with patients that he had never told a colleague about, because it could not be taught and because saying it aloud made it sound like a parlour trick, which it was not. When a man was about to lie to him, there was a half-second before the lie in which the face went still — not blank, organised, the way a stage is still in the dark before the lights come up. Forty years and he had never once been wrong about that stillness. He looked at August now and the face was not organising itself. The face was simply waiting, tired, in the grey light, the way his own father's face had waited at the end, past performance, past wanting anything from the room.

So Voss did the disciplined thing, which was to refuse the trick. He would not ask August something private. To ask was to play the game on August's board, and the moment he asked, any answer, right or wrong, became evidence in a court August had built. The clinical move was to decline the test and name it. You're inviting me to be amazed, he would say, gently. That's the structure of the delusion. Let's not.

"All right," Voss said. "Tell me something about myself, then. Since you're offering. Don't make me ask."

He heard himself say it and understood that he had lost the first exchange already, because curiosity was a kind of consent and he had just given it.

August didn't smile. That was the thing Voss kept catching on, like a nail in a doorframe — at every point where a charlatan would have smiled, August didn't. He looked, if anything, sorry.

"Easy ones first," August said, "because the easy ones you'll explain, and you should. You went to Grahamstown for the first two years of your degree and you've spent forty years letting people assume it was Cape Town, because Cape Town is the answer that ends the conversation and Grahamstown is the answer that starts one you don't want to have. You had a brother. Older. He's the reason you became what you became and he's the reason you've never once treated a member of your own family, not one, not even when they begged. And you keep your father's watch in the left drawer of the desk in your study, not because it runs (it doesn't) but because the one time you wore it, to his funeral, it stopped at the hour the service started, and you have never been able to decide whether that frightened you or comforted you, so you keep it in a drawer where you don't have to choose."

The kettle had gone quiet. Voss was aware of the others not looking at him, which was its own kind of looking.

He made himself breathe and he made himself think, because thinking was the rampart and he would hold it. Grahamstown: findable. A determined man with an afternoon and the right registrar could learn where Solomon Voss did his first two years. The brother: a guess with good odds; men in his profession were so often the survivors of someone, and August had known him thirty years; across thirty years a brother surfaces in an unguarded sentence, a Christmas, a silence at the wrong name. The watch. The watch was a colder thing, but it was the kind of detail a man might have let slip, once, late, over the second bottle, and forgotten he'd let slip; the mind is a sieve for its own confessions. Every one of them had a door, and Voss walked through each door in turn and came out the other side still standing. It could be done. A clever, dying man, with thirty years of you in his memory and nothing left to do with his afternoons but assemble it — it could be done.

"You're doing it right now," August said, not unkindly. "I can see you doing it. Door, door, door. You're very good at it, Sol. You've had to be." He shifted against the pillow and the wet sound came up in his chest and he waited it down. "So here's the third one, and the third one doesn't have a door, and I'm sorry, because you're going to look for one anyway and not finding it is going to be worse than if I'd just hit you."

"August," Danny said — the first thing Danny had said, low, a hand half-raised. "You don't have to —"

"I do, though." August didn't look away from Voss. "Sol. Eleven days ago you had a dream you haven't told anyone, because there's no one left to tell it to who'd understand, and because it embarrassed you, a man your age. You dreamed you were a boy in the Grahamstown house and the phone was ringing in the hall and you couldn't reach it, the floor had gone long the way floors do in dreams, and you knew — the way you know things in dreams — that if you could just reach the phone before it stopped, your brother would be on the other end, and he'd be alive, and the whole of the rest of your life would turn out to have been the dream. And you woke up with your hand out. In the dark. Reaching for a phone on a nightstand that's been on the other side of the bed since your wife died." He paused. "You have not told one living soul. You decided, lying there, that you never would."

The room was very quiet. Outside, the branch.

And Voss reached for the door, because that was what he did, that was the whole of what he was, and his hand closed on nothing. There was no afternoon in a registrar's office for this. There was no second bottle. There was no unguarded Christmas. The dream was eleven days old and it lived in one skull and the skull was his, and he had told it to no one, had resolved to tell it to no one, in the specific privacy of three in the morning, and the resolution itself was part of what August had just said back to him.

He was aware, distantly, of the clinician in him noting his own physiological response, the cold sheet down the back, the heart finding a higher gear, and filing it, because the clinician did not stop working even now, even here. Note the response. The response is data. The response is not proof. There were explanations. There were always explanations. He simply could not, in this moment, in this chair, lay his hand on one.

"That's not possible," Voss said, and heard how thin it came out, and hated it.

"No," August agreed gently. "It isn't. That's rather the point." He let it sit. Then, softer: "I'm not doing this to win, Sol. I want you to understand that. There's nothing to win. I'm dying whether you believe me or not. I'm doing it because I need at least one of you to take the next part seriously, and you're the one the others will follow. If I can move you, I can move the room. And I have to move the room, because the next part isn't about me." His eyes went, at last, to Danny, and came back. "It's about which of us pays for what I did."

Earl, who had not moved in some minutes, who sat with his forearms on his knees and his hands loose and his eyes on the cold hearth, said, without looking up, in his flat unhurried way:

"Ask him how he knows what he changed."

It was the first full sentence Earl had offered, and it dropped into the room like a stone into a well, and Voss felt the temperature of the night change around it, because Earl had not asked whether. Earl had skipped the whole country Voss was still standing in, the country of is this true, and had walked out the far side of it to the only question that mattered if it was — how do you know which thread you pulled — and he had asked it in the tone of a man asking another man to pass the salt.

August looked at Earl for a long moment, and something moved between them that Voss couldn't read, two men who had known each other in some hard place a long time ago, and August said:

"Because I've watched him die ten times, Earl. You learn the shape of a thing you've watched ten times."

And Danny Reiss, twenty years younger than every other man in the room and the only one with all his life still ahead of him — or not, depending on which of them was right — set the pharmacy bag down on the floor beside his chair, very carefully, as though it might break, and said nothing at all, and looked at the man who had just said he had buried him ten times with an expression Voss had seen exactly once before in forty years, on the face of a woman being told the body was her son's: the face of a person discovering that the worst thing is also, unbearably, a kind of being loved.

Three

So August told it, and Voss — who had come to hold a hand and was now holding the arms of his chair — listened the way you listen to a thing you have decided not to believe and cannot stop hearing.

The first time, August said, he hadn’t known it was a loop. You don’t. You’re a child in your own bed and the ceiling is the ceiling you remember and you think, with the flat acceptance of a child, this is a very long dream, and then you are eight and it is not a dream and you understand, slowly, across a year, the way you understand cold water, that you are living it again and that you are the only one who knows. “I was a strange child the second time,” he said. “You’d have hated me, Earl. Knew everything. Said nothing right. A forty-year-old man behind an eight-year-old’s face, trying to remember how to be afraid of the dark so my mother wouldn’t look at me funny.” A small dry sound that was not quite a laugh. “I learned to perform the boy. That was the first skill. Everything after was easier.”

He had tried, the early times, to do the obvious thing. Who wouldn’t. “You think you’ll fix it,” he said. “You think: I have been handed the one gift no one gets, I will spend it well. I’ll get the medicine to the people before the bad year. I’ll stand in the right square on the right morning and say the thing that stops it.” He shook his head, slowly, against the pillow. “It doesn’t take. I don’t know why and I’ve had a long time to wonder. You move the big stone and the river just goes around it. The bad year comes a different way. The man you saved in March is gone by August on a road you didn’t know to watch. I used to think I was being punished. Now I think it’s just — weight. The world has a weight and it wants to fall the way it falls. You can change where you stand in it. You can't change much about where it's going."

"That's convenient," Voss said, because the rampart was still there and he would man it. "A claim of miraculous knowledge that conveniently can never be used to do any verifiable good."

"Yes," August said simply. "It is convenient. It's also true. Both happen." He looked at Voss with that terrible patience. "You've spent forty years listening to people explain their lives in ways that happen to excuse them, Sol, and you've learned to hear the excuse under the explanation. I'm telling you there's a kind of true thing that sounds exactly like an excuse, and the only way to tell them apart is to have lived it, and you haven't, and I have, and that asymmetry is the whole tragedy of trying to tell you. I know how it sounds. I knew how it would sound the first time I rehearsed it, which was about sixty years and three lifetimes ago."

It was the offhand arithmetic that did it, more than the dream had. Sixty years and three lifetimes ago. He said it the way a man says last Tuesday. No emphasis, no plea. And Voss, against every discipline he owned, felt the floor of the ordinary tilt under him — not belief, he would not have called it belief, but the first hairline crack in the certainty that the floor was there at all.

Danny had not spoken since the pharmacy bag. He spoke now, and his voice was careful, the careful of a man walking on a frozen thing, testing it. "What's it like," he said. "When it — resets. When you die."

The room shifted toward him. Voss saw August's face change for Danny in a way it had not changed for him, the cold patient surface going soft at one edge, and he understood, with the part of his mind that never stopped working, that whatever else was true or false in this room, this was not performed: the old man loved the young one. You cannot fake the particular gentleness of a person choosing easier words.

"It doesn't hurt," August said. "I'll tell you that first, because I know it's the thing you're actually asking. There's no — corridor. No light. You're tired, the way I'm tired now, and then you're not tired, and you're small, and warm, and the ceiling is the ceiling, and for one morning every time you get to be a person who doesn't know anything yet. That morning's the best thing there is. I've had eleven of them.

I think I'd have done the whole circle just for the mornings." He drew the wet breath. "What it's like, the rest of it — Danny, it's like reading a book you love, out loud, to someone, for the eleventh time. You know every turn. You know the sad part's coming. And you find, to your surprise, that knowing doesn't make you feel it less. It makes you feel it more, because now you can see it coming from three chapters off and there's not one thing you can do but keep reading in a steady voice so the person listening isn't frightened before they have to be."

He was not looking at Danny when he finished. He was looking at the cold hearth, the way Earl looked at it. And Voss thought: that is either the most sophisticated emotional manipulation I have witnessed in forty years of professional exposure to it, or it is the simple truth, and I have built my whole life on being able to tell the difference, and I cannot tell the difference, and the not-being-able-to-tell was, he realised, the actual emergency — worse than the dream, worse than the arithmetic. A man's competence is the last room he locks. August had got into it without seeming to try.

"You said three chapters off," Earl said. Still the flat voice, still the hands loose. "You can see the sad part coming."

"Yes."

"Then you've seen all of ours." Earl lifted his head, finally, and looked at August, and his weathered closed-door face had nothing on it that Voss could name, which was somehow the most frightening thing the night had done yet. "You know how I go. You know how Sol goes. You've watched it ten times." A beat. "And you brought us here to tell us you changed the book."

"I changed one line of it," August said.

"One line," Earl said.

"The line where Danny dies at twenty-six."

And there it was, set down in the middle of the room at last, plain as a coin on a table, and nobody reached for it. Danny had gone very still. Not the organised stillness of a man about to lie — Voss knew that stillness and this was its opposite — the stillness of a man who has just been handed his own death certificate with a cancelled stamped across it, and cannot work out whether that is the best news of his life or a sentence passed on someone else he hasn't met yet.

“How,” Danny said. Just the one word.

August turned his head on the pillow and looked at the youngest man in the room with the full weight of whatever a person becomes after eleven lives of loving the same people and losing most of them on schedule, and he said, “Not tonight. Tonight you only need to know that I did, and that the world keeps its books balanced, and that somewhere in this room is the entry on the other side of yours.” His gaze moved, then — not pointing, nothing so crude, just moving, across Earl, across Voss, the way a hand moves across a ledger feeling for the line — and came to rest, for a moment that went on a beat too long, on no one in particular and therefore on all of them.

“That’s the part I need you sober for,” August said. “Because I think it’s coming due. And I don’t know which of you it wants.”

Four

For a while no one said anything, and the house did its house-sounds, and the grey at the window went a shade greyer, and Voss understood that the afternoon was actually ending, that there would be a night after this, that the candle of the light was a real candle and it was burning down.

It was Voss who broke it, and he broke it the only way he had left, which was to go back to work.

“Let me tell you what I think is happening,” he said, and he was pleased to hear his voice come level again, the consulting-room voice, the voice that had walked a thousand frightened people back from their own ledges. “Because I think I owe you the truth more than I owe you comfort, August, and we’ve known each other too long for me to sit here and play the credulous audience you need.” He leaned forward. “A man at the end of his life looks back and sees an accident. Just an accident — Danny’s accident, your illness, the ordinary butchery of chance. And the mind cannot bear an accident. The mind is a machine for making meaning and it would rather build a cathedral of suffering than stand in an empty field. So it builds one. I have lived this ten times. I chose this. There is a system, and a price, and a balance. It’s not madness, August. It’s the opposite of madness. It’s the sanest thing a frightened animal can do — it’s authorship. You’ve taken the worst thing, which is that none of it meant anything, and you’ve made it mean everything. And the proof —” he lifted a hand before August could speak “— the proof is that the one thing your system produced, the one intervention, is the thing you wanted most in the world. Danny, alive. Of course the magic saved Danny. The magic is for saving Danny. You didn’t discover a loop. You built a machine whose only output is the boy you couldn't lose."

It was, he thought, the best work he had done in years. It was kind and it was true and it left August a way to be loved without being believed, which was the most a man could offer another at a deathbed. He sat back, spent, and waited for it to land.

August listened to all of it with his eyes closed, and when Voss finished he kept them closed a moment longer, and then he opened them and there was something in them that Voss had not budgeted for, which was gratitude.

"That's beautiful, Sol," he said, and meant it. "That's genuinely beautiful. If I were you I'd believe it too. I'd hold onto it with both hands." The dry warmth. "There's only the one problem with it, and it's the dream, and you already know it's the dream, which is why you didn't mention the dream just now. You built me a lovely cathedral and you walked us all the way through it and you very carefully went around the one room you can't explain. The boy reaching for the phone in the dark eleven days ago, that I had no door to. You'd have led with that, Sol, if you could have folded it in. You're too good not to. You left it out because it doesn't fit, and a man who builds an honest cathedral doesn't leave the load-bearing stone outside in the yard."

And Voss, who had indeed left it out, who had constructed the entire edifice of authorship precisely so that he would not have to stand in the one room where his own private dream had been read back to him by a dying man — Voss felt the cathedral he had just built go quietly transparent, and through its walls he could see the thing he had walked around, sitting in the yard exactly where August said it was.

"The morphine could —" he began.

"It could," August agreed. "Tell me the dose. You don't know the dose. You assumed the dose, just now, because the dose is a door and you wanted a door. I'm on less than you think. Earl can show you the chart." He didn't press it. He never pressed. That was the unbearable part. A charlatan presses, a charlatan needs the win, and August kept handing him the exits and the exits kept opening onto the same yard. "I'm not trying to take your cathedral, Sol. I'm trying to tell you there's a price coming and I'd like the cleverest man I know to be looking at the real thing when it arrives, not at a beautiful explanation of why it can't be real."

"Then tell us the price." This from Earl, flat, final. "Stop circling it. You said the books balance. You said Danny's alive on this side, so somebody's the entry on the other. You've watched all ten of our deaths. So you know whose turn it was supposed to be." A pause that had a floor missing under it. "Say the name, August. You didn't bring three of us here to be vague. You brought three of us here because one of us is the bill."

August was quiet for a long moment.

"I don't know the name," he said. "That's the truth, and it's worse than a name." He let the breath go. "Here's what I know. Every life, all ten of them, Danny dies at twenty-six. Spring. The same week. I tried everything, the early times. Moved him, warned him, locked the doors. He always found the one I missed. By the fourth life I stopped trying, because trying was its own cruelty, watching it come and pretending it might not. I let it come. Eight times I sat where one of you is sitting and I let that boy die on schedule because I'd learned the river goes around." He stopped. His hands were not quite steady on the blanket now. "This life I did one thing. Small. The smallest thing I had never tried, because it was the one that cost me instead of him. I won't tell you what — not because I'm hiding it, because if I tell you, you'll do the arithmetic out loud and I don't think this room survives it tonight. But it worked. He's twenty-eight. He's sitting right there. For the first time in eleven lives I have seen Danny Reiss turn twenty-seven."

Voss looked at Danny, and Danny was looking at his own hands, and there was on the young man's face the specific horror of a person being told he is a miracle who has begun to do the sum that a miracle implies — if I am alive against the weight of the world, then the weight is somewhere, leaning on someone, and these are the only someones in the room.

"And the books balance," August said, very quietly. "They always balance. The world let me have him. It has not told me what it's taking back. But I've felt it the way you feel weather coming in your bad knee, all this last month, getting closer — and I know it's in this room, and I know it's one of the three of you, and I have spent the last of myself getting you all in one place so that whichever of you it is doesn't meet it alone in the dark the way Danny used to, every spring, for ten springs, with nobody who knew.”

The light at the window was nearly gone. Somewhere in the house a clock Voss had not noticed all afternoon ticked, and he found he was counting it, and made himself stop.

“That’s why you wanted the doctor,” Voss said slowly. “Not the friend. The doctor. You think one of us is going to —” he could not find a clinical word for it and that was its own small defeat “— and you want someone in the room who knows what to do with a body.”

“No, Sol.” And now, for the first time all night, August’s composure thinned, and underneath it Voss saw the actual man, frightened, eighty years of it, all eleven lifetimes of it, looking out. “I wanted the doctor because I needed someone who would fight me the whole way and lose, so that when it happens — when it happens in front of all of you tonight — there’s one person in this room who tried as hard as a human being can try not to believe it, and couldn’t help it anyway. I need a witness who didn’t want to be one.” The thin smile. “I need you, Sol, specifically because you came here to prove me wrong. You’re the only verdict anyone would trust. Including me.”

Danny stood up.

He did it quietly, the careful way he did everything, but in that room, at that hour, a man rising to his feet was an event, and three faces turned to him. He stood with his hands at his sides and he looked down at August, and when he spoke his voice was not angry, which was worse than angry.

“I’m not going to be that,” Danny said. “Whatever it is. I’m not going to sit here and be the reason one of you —” He stopped. Started again, lower. “You want to know what it’s like on this side, August? You spent the whole afternoon telling us what it’s like to live it ten times. Here’s what it’s like to be the line you changed. You’ve just told me, in front of the two people I’d trust with my life, that I’m walking around on borrowed time that got billed to one of them. That every breath I’ve taken since twenty-six is coming out of somebody else’s account. That you love me —” his voice caught, held “— you love me so much that you broke the only law there is, and the bill came to this room, and now I get to spend whatever’s left of tonight watching the three of you wonder which one of you I cost.” He shook his head. “That’s not a gift. I know you meant it as a gift. It’s the heaviest thing anyone’s ever put on me and you did it because you couldn’t stand to lose me, and I understand that, I do, but August — I would rather have died at twenty-six not knowing, than live to eighty knowing it was somebody in this room.”

The silence after that had a different quality. Voss, who measured silences for a living, registered its texture and did not like it.

“Sit down, Danny,” Earl said. Not unkind. “You didn’t choose it. A man’s not guilty of being loved.”

"That's exactly what a man's guilty of," Danny said, but he sat.

And Earl — Earl who had said perhaps two hundred words all afternoon, who had carried the chairs and poured the water and looked at the cold hearth like there was a fire in it — Earl leaned back at last, and laced his fingers over his stomach, and said the cold thing, in the flat unhurried voice of a man who had worked it out a long time ago and had only been waiting for the room to catch up.

"It's me," Earl said.

August closed his eyes.

"You know it's me," Earl went on, to August, gently, the way you'd tell a man a thing he already knew and had hoped not to have to hear. "You've known since you walked it back. That's why you can't say the name. It's not that you don't know it. It's that it's mine, and you couldn't get the three of us in a room and say Earl, I traded your life for the boy's, so you said one of you and you let me do the arithmetic myself, because you're a coward about exactly one thing in eleven lifetimes and it's me." He said it without heat. "We were in the Loubser thing together, August. Nineteen eighty- one. You know what I did and what I didn't, and you know I should've gone in that river and didn't, and you've never once asked me how I sleep, which is how I always knew you knew there was something owed." A long breath. "I've felt it too. Not the way you feel it. But a man knows when he's living past his stop. I've known for years. I just didn't have the words you've got for it." He looked at Danny, and the closed door of his face opened, just at the edge, just for the boy. "It's a fair trade, son. Don't you carry it. An old man who should've drowned in 'eighty-one, for you. That's the best deal I've been offered in my life. I'd sign it twice."

"Earl —" Danny started.

"No," Voss said.

It came out of him before he had decided to say it, and they all looked at him, and he heard the clinician's voice and the friend's voice arrive at the same word for once and he let them.

"No. This is —" He stood, himself now, because he could not say it sitting down. "This is the thing I came here to stop and I have spent all afternoon failing to stop it and I am not going to fail at the last part, which is the part that actually matters. Listen to what's happening in this room. A dying man has built a story so complete that it has just persuaded a good and decent person that his own death is owed — that he should welcome it, sign it twice, not carry it. Earl. Earl, look at me. Forty years I have sat across from people who had decided they were the bill that had to be paid. Every one of them had a story as airtight as this one. Every single one. And the story is always, always the disease talking, dressed up as arithmetic, and the cruelest thing it ever does is make the person grateful for the sentence. You are not living past your stop. You are a man who survived something in 1981 and has been quietly waiting forty years for permission to be punished for it, and tonight a person you love has handed you that permission wrapped in a miracle, and I am telling you as the only one in this room whose entire profession is the difference — do not take it.”

The room held. Outside the last of the grey was going to black against the window, and the unnoticed clock ticked, and August lay against his pillow with his eyes still closed and his chest rising on the wet, labouring rhythm Voss had clocked the moment he walked in, weeks, perhaps not weeks, and Voss thought, with the cold clear part of him that never stopped: there. That's the answer. There was never going to be a death in this room tonight except the one that was always coming. He's dying. He will die, maybe tonight, and his beautiful machine will make it look like the price being paid, and we will all walk out of here believing what we were primed to believe, and that is how it works, that is how it has always worked, the prophecy that arranges to be fulfilled by the one death that was inevitable anyway —

“Sol,” August said, without opening his eyes. His voice had gone thin and far. “It’s not me. I know you’ve just decided it’s me. It’s the tidy answer and you’ve earned a tidy answer.” The faintest movement of his mouth. “But I’ve died ten times and I know exactly what mine feels like coming, and this isn’t it. Mine’s a week off yet. Maybe two.” The breath. “What’s in the room tonight is faster than me.”

And then Earl made a small sound.

It was not a large sound. It was the sound a man makes when something he has carried for a long time shifts — a short exhalation, almost relief — and Voss turned, already moving, already the doctor and nothing else, and saw that Earl's flat closed-door face had gone slack on one side, just slightly, the way a curtain goes slack when the hand lets go of it, and that the loose laced fingers over his stomach had come unlaced, one hand drifting open, and that the man was looking at the cold hearth still, with an expression that was not fear and was not surprise but was, terribly, recognition — the look of a man greeting a thing he had been told all afternoon was on its way.

Six

Afterward Voss could account for every second of it, because the doctor in him had taken the body and run it like a drill, and the drill did not care what the afternoon had been about.

He had Earl on the floor before the man had finished sliding, one hand behind the head so it didn't crack the boards, and he was talking — Earl, Earl, squeeze my hand, look at me — and reading the face the way he'd read a thousand faces, the dropped left side, the pooling slackness, and his own mouth was already saying the word, stroke, it's a stroke, Danny call them, now, and Danny was on the phone in the hall, the very hall, Voss thought from somewhere far off, where a boy had reached for a phone in a dream eleven days ago, and the thought was obscene and he put it down and kept working.

He did everything. He knew, even as he did it, that he was doing it partly to prove a thing — that a man does not die because a story said he would, that there is a left middle cerebral artery and a clot and a clock, and the clock is just a clock, and he, Solomon Voss, would hold this man inside the window of the clock by main strength if he had to, the way Earl had carried the chairs. He kept the airway. He kept talking. He had Danny bring a blanket and then take it half away because the man's colour — he watched the colour. He counted. He held Earl Cade's opening-and-closing hand in both of his and he was, he realised distantly, praying, in the only way a lifelong unbeliever prays, which is to say no to the room over and over with everything in you.

And the whole time, behind him, August did not move from the bed and did not call out and did not, God help him, seem afraid — he lay with his head turned toward them and watched, and his face had the specific stillness Voss had been waiting for all afternoon and had finally learned to read: not the organised stillness of a lie, and not the slack stillness of the dying, but a third stillness, the stillness of a man watching the last act of a play he has seen ten times, in a steady voice, so the person listening isn't frightened before they have to be.

It was that stillness, more than anything, that Voss could not forgive and could not explain. Because a man whose friend is having a stroke on the floor is not still like that. A man whose entire elaborate delusion is in the act of being confirmed is not still like that either — he is vindicated, he is wild with it, the cathedral is lighting up. August was neither. August was grieving, quietly, completely, and not at all surprised, and the not-being-surprised sat in Voss's chest like a stone going down a well, because there are only two kinds of men who are not surprised by a death: the ones who made it happen, and the ones who already knew.

The ambulance came. Voss had given them a clean handover, the times, the presentation, the lot, his voice flat and exact, and they had the trolley and the lift and they took Earl out through the door into the dark where the world had been all night, waiting outside the window, and the room was suddenly very large and very quiet with three men in it instead of four, and the cold hearth that Earl had been looking at the whole afternoon stared back at them with nothing in it.

Danny came back in from the cold and stood in the doorway and did not sit. He looked at August on the bed and his face was wet and he made no move to hide it.

"You let me argue with him," Danny said. "You let me sit here and tell him not to carry it and the whole time you knew it was already —" He couldn't finish.

"I didn't know it was tonight," August said. The thin voice. "I swear that to you, Danny, with the little I've got left to swear on. I knew it was close. I felt it close. I didn't know it was while you were still in the chair." He turned his head. "I'd have spared you that. Of all of you, I'd have spared you that."

Voss stood in the middle of the room with Earl's blood, what little there was, from where the head had grazed the table edge on the way down despite his hand, drying on his cuff, and he made himself, one last time, be the rampart. He made himself say it.

"It was a stroke." His voice came out steady. "A left MCA occlusion in a man of seventy-something with a history I'd bet my licence includes untreated pressure and the kind of grief that thickens blood. It was a stroke, August. It had a cause, and the cause was biology, and it was coming whether you'd ever heard the word loop in your life or not. You did not trade Earl for Danny. There is no ledger. There is a clot and a clock and an old man who'd carried something heavy for forty years, and the only thing your story did was make sure he spent his last clear minutes believing he deserved it. That's not arithmetic. That's the cruellest thing I've watched a kind man do, and you did it out of love, and it's still the cruellest thing I've watched."

He was breathing hard when he finished. He wanted, badly, for it to be true. He had never in forty years wanted an explanation to be true the way he wanted this one.

August looked at him for a long moment with the third stillness, the grieving one, and then he did a small thing that Voss would carry out of that house and into every night of the rest of his life.

He didn't argue. He didn't defend the cathedral. He simply reached over to the little table by the bed, slowly, the wet breath catching, and he picked up a folded piece of paper that had been sitting there the whole afternoon, weighted under the water glass where Earl had set it down, and he held it out to Voss with a hand that shook.

"I wrote it down this morning," August said. "Before any of you came. I couldn't say it out loud — I told you, if I said it out loud the room wouldn't survive the night, and it didn't, it didn't survive the night anyway. But I wrote it down. The thing I changed. The small thing that cost me instead of him. And underneath it I wrote what I thought the books would take, because I did know, Sol, I did the arithmetic this morning the way Earl did it in his chair, and I couldn't carry being right." The paper trembled in the air between them. "Don't read it now. Read it when you've decided. Read it when you're sure it was just a clot and a clock. And if I'm a frightened old man who built a cathedral, you'll read a frightened old man's guess, and you can grieve me clean." The thinnest breath. "And if I'm not — you'll know I knew his name before the sun came up, and you'll have to decide what that means, with your forty years, in your study, with my friend's blood still on your sleeve."

Voss did not take the paper.

It hung there in the lamplight, in the old man's shaking hand, and Voss stood with his whole life's training telling him that to take it was to step onto August's board for the last and worst time, that a sealed prediction is the oldest trick there is, that of course it would say Earl, that he could write Earl on a paper tonight himself and call it prophecy in the morning — and the cold clear part of him, the part that never stopped, said quietly: then take it. If it's a trick, taking it costs you nothing. You only refuse to take it if some part of you has already decided what it says.

He took the paper.

Seven

August Renner died nine days later, in the bed by the window, in the early morning, which was — Voss would learn, because he asked the hospice nurse the question that no rational man should need to ask — exactly the week August had said. A week off, maybe two. It had been nine days. Voss did the arithmetic standing in the corridor and then he was angry at himself for doing the arithmetic, and then he understood that he was going to be doing the arithmetic for the rest of his life, and that this, precisely this, was what August had done to him: he had not made Voss believe. He had made Voss calculate. He had taken a man whose life's work was the difference between a true thing and a frightened thing and he had moved him to the one place from which that difference can no longer be seen.

Earl Cade did not die. That was the part Voss had not let himself expect and could not, afterward, make fit. The clot dissolved or was dissolved; the window held; Voss's own hand behind the head, his own clean handover, the times he'd called out exact — the medicine had worked, as medicine sometimes does, and Earl came home from the rehabilitation ward four months later with a left hand that didn't fully close and a drawl gone slightly slower and otherwise himself, and when Voss visited he found Earl in the garden looking at nothing with the same attention he'd once given the cold hearth, and Earl said, before Voss could speak, in the slow voice: "He was wrong, then. About me being the bill." And Voss said, "Yes." And Earl said, "Or he changed it again. At the end. The small thing that costs him instead." And the two of them sat in the garden and did not look at each other, two men who had each privately done the same arithmetic and arrived at the same place, which was no place, which was the yard outside the cathedral with the load-bearing stone sitting in it in the rain.

Because that was the trouble with Earl living. A clot and a clock would have killed him; the story said the books must balance; and Earl had lived — which proved the story wrong, which should have let Voss grieve August clean, the way August had offered. Except that Voss had been in the room. He had seen the third stillness. He had watched a man grieve a death that hadn't finished happening yet, without surprise, and then watched that same man, on the last morning, hold out a piece of paper and decline to be believed. And a frightened mind building a cathedral does not decline to be believed. A frightened mind needs the win. August had spent the whole afternoon, and the last paper, handing him the exits — and the exits were all still open, every one, the morphine and the registrar and the overheard confession and the clot and the clock, and Voss could walk out of any of them any time he liked, and that was the horror of it: the door was never locked. He was free to leave. He simply could not make himself walk through, because to walk through was to be certain, and he had stood in that room and lost the thing that made certainty possible.

The paper was in the left drawer of the desk in his study, with his father's stopped watch.

He had not read it.

He told himself, the first months, that he had not read it because reading it changed nothing — if it said Earl, it proved only that August had guessed the obvious, the sick old friend, the heavy-hearted survivor; and if it said one of the others, it was simply wrong, and a wrong prophecy is no prophecy at all. Either way the paper was a coin that could only ever land on coincidence or error, and a disciplined man does not flip a coin he has already read the outcome of.

But that was the cathedral, and Voss had learned, that grey afternoon, to walk around his own cathedrals and look in the yard.

The truth in the yard was simpler and worse. He had not read the paper because he was a man who had spent forty years and his whole self on being able to tell the true thing from the frightened thing, and he had finally met a thing he could not tell, and as long as the paper stayed folded he was a man holding a question. The moment he read it he became a man holding an answer he could not trust — and he had built his life on trusting his answers, and he was old now, and he did not have it in him to discover, at the end, that the one faculty he'd staked everything on had failed him in the one room where it mattered. While the paper stayed folded, he could still be Solomon Voss. He understood, sitting in his study with the drawer closed, that August had known this too. That August, who had read him to the bone — the Grahamstown years, the brother, the watch, the boy reaching for the phone — had known that the cruelest and kindest thing he could leave the cleverest man he knew was not the answer but the envelope: a question he would carry, unopened, into the dark, exactly the way August had carried his.

You learn the shape of a thing you've watched ten times.

Voss took the watch out of the drawer, sometimes, in the evenings. It had stopped at the hour his father's service began and he had never been able to decide whether that frightened him or comforted him, and now he understood that he had kept it for forty years for precisely the reason he was keeping the folded paper — because some things you hold because you can't decide, and the holding is the only honest place to stand.

He turned it over in his hand, the dead watch, the stopped hour, and he thought about a man who had lived the same life eleven times and called the mornings the best thing there was. He thought about the fact that the watch ran backward as easily as forward in his memory now — he could see his father winding it, see it on the wrist in the coffin, and the two images had stopped having an order, the way August's lifetimes had stopped having an order, the way the night in that house no longer ran from the four chairs to the ambulance but sat all at once in him, every moment touching every other, a thing you could read from either end and arrive at the same closed face.

He set the watch back in the drawer, beside the folded paper he would never open, and he closed the drawer, and he sat for a while in the dark of the study with his hand still out on the desk, as it had been in the dark eleven nights before August came, reaching across a bed that was on the wrong side now for a phone that wasn't ringing.

It would ring or it wouldn't. He would answer it or he wouldn't. There was a version of all of this, he had come to understand, in which he had already done both, many times, and would do them again, and the not-knowing which version this was had stopped being a torment and become, on the good nights, something almost like company.

He left his hand out on the desk in the dark, and he waited, the way you wait for a thing you have done before, and cannot remember, and will do again, and he found — to his surprise, and against everything he had ever believed about himself — that he was not, any longer, entirely sure he wanted the morning to come and make him a person who knew which way the night had run.
